

Canada's visa rules depend on your nationality and purpose of travel, but generally require a valid passport, proof of financial support, and that you will leave Canada at the end of your visit. Citizens of some countries require a Temporary Resident Visa, while others may need an Electronic Travel Authorization \(eTA\), and some are visa-exempt. You must apply for the correct document, provide a completed application, and meet eligibility criteria to be admitted.

General requirements

- Valid passport: Must be valid for at least six months beyond your intended stay and have at least two blank pages.
- Proof of funds: You must prove you have enough money for your stay, the amount depending on your length of stay and accommodations.
- Ties to your home country: You must convince an immigration officer you have ties (like a job, home, or family) that will ensure you return to your home country.
- Purpose of visit: You must convince an officer of your legitimate reason for visiting and that you will leave Canada at the end of your visit.
- Good health: You must be in good health.
- Clean record: You must not have any criminal or immigration-related convictions.

How to determine if you need a visa or eTA

- The requirement depends on your nationality, the type of travel document you have, and how you are traveling.
- Use the official Canada.ca website to determine if you need a visitor visa or an eTA.

Types of temporary resident visas

- Single-entry visa: Allows for one entry into Canada.
- Multiple-entry visa: Allows for multiple entries into Canada within the visa's validity period.
